The Appellants had recovered evidence which, as they alleged, fully proved the inferiority of the goods furnished, as compared with the specifications in the invoice, and the patterns originally sent; and instrumentum noviter repertum had always been considered as sufficient ground for opening up the most solemn and final judicial procedure. The Appellants likewise denied the homologation. They had, indeed, granted bills to the Respondents, for payment of the balance; but that they had been obliged to do, by the terms upon which the sequestration had been recalled. The Lord Chancellor. The Appellants case appeared to him to amount to this, --That they had not chosen to make use in proper time of evidence which they had in their own possession.
