Not illustrated. 1868 Excerpt: .his brightest day--In dreams his loving Helen is never far away. Tis moonlight on the Pamplico, I hear a gentle roar, The waters laugh around me, I see the sandy shore; My eyelids close a twinkling, and sorrows cease a while, For I see the sands of distant lands, and Helen's gentle smile. How dear the waters where we sailed a few brief months ago, They sweeten with their memory the Neuse and Pamplico, But dearer far the moon and star, of mild and cheering ray, For they shine on brave New England, and Helen far away. I wake, but not to murmur o'er the scenes that round me lie, I look beyond the ocean's wave, and whisper, By and by--No more fatigue, nor saddening care--no more of war's alarms--New England all, around me, and Helen in my arms. I seem to wake again, and lo! beyond the moon and star, A world of light and glory, that knows no strife of war; And joyous as a seraph, I hail the brighter day When Heaven, and Home, and Helen, are never far away. JOTTINGS. Criminal indifference to danger is at least as common as cowardice. Every soldier will recollect multitudes of instances where he or one of his comrades had sat upright upon the ground, or even stood upon his feet, when the order was to lie down, and has continued to do so till a sharp and peremptory command from...
