Arthur began to consider whether it was not his duty to follow the doctor s advice. Mary hoped that he would do so, as he would then live at home with her. Mr Maitland promised every encouragement, remarking-- Now I have lost poor Gilbert, there is no one else to keep on the farm when I am gone, or to afford a home to Mary. s This latter argument weighed greatly with Arthur. He had had indeed no definite aim in his wish to go to college; he might perhaps become a master in a school, or take pupils at the university, or should he get a fellowship, obtain a living, but he had never thought even in that case...
